New version of CRUCC - a program for radio control frees your radio on a car. A top official from the European Commission said this week that while the UK is considering a Brexit transition period, and some aspects of the UK's departure from the EU can be delayed in order to agree a future trade deal with the bloc, it is up to the British government to show that the EU and UK can agree a transition agreement. "If Britain wants to negotiate a transition, it is up to them to show the European Commission and the Union [that they can do so]," European Commissioner for Internal Market Willem Debelde said on the sidelines of an event in Luxembourg. He added that this could include a need for Britain to explain why it is not able to negotiate a comprehensive trade agreement with the EU before the March 2019 withdrawal date. "I think they have a very short time to make this happen. They have the EU29 negotiating directives telling them what the position is, but we can do a lot of explaining afterwards." Brexit: European Union prepares plan to exempt UK from Irish backstop 'Brussels processes need to agree with London' Debelde said that the conditions for a "phased withdrawal" would need to be spelled out in legal terms, including details of an extension to the transition period, and an agreement on services and the financial services, or banking, chapter of the first phase of the negotiations. His comments come two days before the Brexit talks resume in Brussels, with discussions on a future trade deal expected to centre around the UK's desire to negotiate on economic issues, such as access to its market, in parallel with political issues around the Northern Ireland border and the question of a transition period. At a press conference on the sidelines of the dinner, Brexit Secretary David Davis hinted the UK would seek to agree a transition that lasted as long as a year, with new talks on the future relationship from day one of the transition. He said that the UK's position is that the offer of a "phased withdrawal" would be "an insurance policy" to be agreed if there is no

Crucc 2.4 is the best ever made car audio code (anti-theft) serial calculation. Since version 2.2, this program takes not only serial number but also the parts list as an input file. It is the most complete car radio programming software available. This is just a little software that you can use to turn your radio into a charger for your Nokia. It works perfectly and doesn't bug you the way other programs do. With it you can charge your phone in five different methods. The first method is by inserting the Nokia serial number in the Crucc 2.4 software it then calculates the correct Crucc 2.4 converter code and therefore the code for the Nokia. The next four methods require you to insert all four of the antennas that are provided by the manufacturer. The program calculates the correct code and the converter code, without needing the Nokia serial number, like Crucc 2.4 does. The user simply needs to plug in the Nokia, and it works. It really is that simple. So how come no one has posted this before? Probably because Nokia doesn't like it.
