Computerized vignetting correction: a new technology for hardness perception studies. To investigate whether a recently introduced vignetting correction methodology can aid the subjective assessment of vignetting and may therefore be used to evaluate new lens materials. The method consisted of repeated vignetting measurements on a large population of lenses and subsequent vignette normalization and mathematical interpolation of the results to maintain consistent brightness throughout the dioptric range of the tested lenses. Various artificial pupil diameters were also measured to determine the refractive power of the tested lenses as well as the degree to which the vignette correction algorithm had been successfully applied. Highly significant correlation coefficients were obtained between the measured artificial pupil diameter ( $D(p)$ ) and the degree of vignetting correction applied, respectively ( $R(sp)$ ) within all tested lens designs. The correction quality was found to be relatively independent of the lens's refractive power. The repeatability of the method was rather poor. Although the method has proved to be a convenient tool, additional information sources are certainly needed in order to improve the repeatability of the method. Nonetheless, a good agreement was obtained between the artificial pupil diameter and the applied vignette correction quality.
