Bob Stratton Robert Lee Stratton (September 8, 1919 - November 23, 2015) was an American baseball player who played in the major leagues from to as a pitcher for the Washington Senators (1947-49) and Cleveland Indians (1950-52). Born in Marmora, Illinois, Stratton attended the University of Oregon, where he helped lead the Ducks to the 1940 College World Series. He helped the Oregon team to the 1940 and 1941 College World Series by going 7-3 with a 1.57 ERA in 15 games. In 1942, Stratton was drafted by the Boston Red Sox but opted to play professional baseball instead. He spent three seasons in the minors before signing with the Washington Senators in 1945. While he only appeared in five games for the Senators in 1945, he was still leading the American League pitchers with a 1.15 ERA by mid-July. However, he managed to garner a 2-3 record and a 2.85 ERA in his rookie season. In 1946 Stratton appeared in 16 games for the Senators, going 1-2 with a 4.50 ERA. However, he started the next year with the Newark Bears of the International League. He pitched less with the Bears in 1947, spending a considerable amount of time on the Disabled List, but still had a 3-5 record and a 3.42 ERA in 30 games. >REPORT: SF 49ers Do not Want Jim Tressel To Be Their Coach I'm told by multiple sources close to the situation that the San Francisco 49ers are not looking for their head coach to be Jim Tressel. That's less than ideal, but good news as Tressel is getting the absolute earful...from another team. The niners are from Cincinnati. Yea, the Cincinnati Bengals, NFL nutballs themselves. But hey, going 2-2 against Jim Tressel may not want to stay with the Bengals, but they want him to. The feeling is mutual. There is mutual interest." builder.add(event.getEntityClass()); builder.add(event.getText().value()); logMessageList.add(builder.build()

One of the easiest to learn, but hard to master, RPG combat system. Popular and polished for its fast-paced battle system, but lacking in depth. IS REALLY GOOD!!! Very fluid combat system. It takes skill to keep a man healthy but stupid to keep a man alive. EIGA I like: Easy to play, lots of choices. Love: The martial artsinspired classes have some interesting combat features. I dislike: The mastery of skills is tedious; You aren't given any guidance as to how to improve your skills. The story isn't deep and the base classes are too limited. The requirement to play the game a few times to unlock the rest of the classes is too annoying. Tskle It's not bad. Nice idea. Art looks nice. I love: The art is pretty cute. It's different. I dislike: It's really short; you don't get much out of it. Aroma I like: The story is interesting. Love: There's a good amount of customization to it. I dislike: The combat is a little awkward. You don't really take the time to advance a lot; It took me quite a while to unlock each character's skill. The characters aren't that interesting; They're pretty standard RPG fare. Lightning_Swords I like: It's got a simple control scheme and it's easy to learn. Love: The game has a bff6bb2d33

The Dishonored 2 ending is a pretty tough one for me. The original story was very dark. I read it almost entirely as having a heavy, action-packed murder mystery vibe, despite the lack of combat. The game was playing with a few narrative tricks, and the overall narrative style of the game guided me to this conclusion in the third act.

I didn't really know what to expect from the DLC and found it quite unexpected. However, what I did know was that this ending was inevitable. The first three chapters of The Brigmore Witches have always stuck out to me. Stopping the baby killers in the first chapter, clearing the bridge with the giant machete in the second chapter, and altering the climax of the third with the teleporter. It was the third chapter that made me feel like I stumbled on a formula that was familiar, but I couldn't place it.

Regardless, I hope all of you enjoyed this ending as much as I did. It's been a pleasure writing and developing this long campaign. A special thanks to Malcolm Stuart for his support and encouragement to just go for it.

In situ preparation of electrospun polyurethane/polyaniline nanofibers with conductive properties for neural tissue engineering. The electrospun non-woven polyurethane/polyaniline (PU/PANI) nanofibers were prepared by in situ oxidative polymerization of polyurethane (PU) in the presence of PANI in nanofibers. The presence of the PANI in the electrospun polyurethane/polyaniline (PU/PANI) fibers improved the solubility of PU and enhanced the mechanical properties of the nanofibers. The investigation results indicated that the ratio of PU/PANI in the PU/PANI nanofibers can be easily controlled by the influence of electrospinning parameters. The PU/PANI nanofibers with desired ratio (60% of PU/PANI) had higher electrical conductivity (2.15 \times 10(-3) S/cm) and better mechanical properties than those of pure PU nanofibers (1.10 × 10(-3) S/cm), which were potentially used for scaffold-free nerve tissue engineering. Credit: 360/Everett Historical/Getty When it comes to catastrophic floods, human beings aren't the only ones willing to risk their lives to save those of their fellow citizens. Google can help. In 2017, the search engine's machine-learning division, DeepMind, created an AI tool that can predict when a flood is about to strike. The system can learn to recognise patterns in millions of data points — and then uses those patterns to estimate when a flood is about to happen in a given location. The system uses data from satellites, weather forecasts and historical flood records to create an overall flood prediction for a region of the world. It doesn't predict what the flood will actually do (Google's researchers still need to manually check the results), but if the AI's predictions are right, the system can alert people and organisations in the region about the impending flood. The system is still in beta, but Google's flood-prediction AI is already proving its worth.
