Moderate Rebels The Moderates were a faction of the United Irishmen in the 18th century, who believed in a British constitution for Ireland.

Background The United Irishmen were a group of revolutionaries that had sprung up in Northern Ireland in the 1770s. They aimed at the overthrow of the English parliament in Ireland, and the creation of a provisional Irish Republic in its place, and were divided on political matters. The main divisions were between the Leige (society) and the Dún Ruadh (fortress) groups. There was also a branch in Ulster that became known as the Red Hand Club. Within the Leige in particular, there was much dissension and rivalry between the different groups and a continuing feud with the bodyguard of the Earl of Enniskillen, who were known as the Horse and Groom. There was also rivalry between the more moderate, non-sectarian Moderates and the aggressive, sectarian Defenders of the Constitution. The United Irishmen Act 1793 The United Irishmen were outlawed in 1793, and many of the leaders fled to the continent. A secret organisation, called the Society of United Irishmen, began to develop a plan to continue the struggle, in both the north and south. The moderate leaders of the Society of United Irishmen in the south looked for a compromise with the government of Lord Sussex, who was sympathetic to the Society's aims. When this was not forthcoming, they aligned with the Defenders of the Constitution in an attempt to capture Dublin and a fort called the magazine of arms. On the night of 23 May 1798, forces under these two moderate factions, along with the Defenders, retook the magazine and killed a number of Defenders. The bloodshed, together with the fact that most of the moderate United Irishmen were from the eastern counties, led to the collapse of any moderate support for the Society.
