Please look at the time stamp on the story to see when it was last updated. Please enable Javascript to watch this video ESTHERVILLE, Tenn. -- If you thought the nuclear bomb industry was just making radioisotopes in laboratory and underground locations, it's time you realized there's another, even more deadly way the bomb makers have been using it, for decades. A recent study conducted by the US Army and the Environmental Protection Agency, in collaboration with the University of Tennessee, found that nuclear explosions do emit a smaller shock wave, which is a reason nuclear weapons were used in testing. The shock wave from a nuclear explosion can reach up to 5 miles in duration, even for a small sized nuclear blast. For a large sized nuclear explosion like the one at Hiroshima, the shock wave could reach up to 20 miles in duration. The reason that these shock waves were especially dangerous was because they can travel faster than the speed of sound. This is bad news because the faster shock waves can cause things like "secondary objects such as cars, windows, or people to be propelled by the air pressure blast wave that follows the shock wave," according to the EPA website. In the above video, obtained from the University of Tennessee, a blast is created in the Gulf of Mexico. The shock wave travels at over 2,000 miles per hour and it's visible. "Compared to surrounding (oil and gas pipelines) for distances of several miles the shock wave will travel faster than the speed of sound (approximately
