Related Stories Topics: The Palestinian authority announced on Saturday it would expand the buffer zone separating Israelis and Palestinians in Bethlehem as part of the so-called "quiet mechanism" it set up to facilitate negotiations. The expansion of the buffer zone comes after Israeli security forces, on Friday, were forced to back down and withdraw from the main entrance to the Church of the Nativity of the Nativity, known to Christians as the Church of the Nativity and to Muslims as the Bab al-Maqam, after Palestinians and Jewish ultra-orthodox pilgrims clashed following an altercation at the entrance to the Church. The Palestinian security forces have been controlled during the last month by the Palestinian Authority, which has been under international pressure to maintain the status quo at the Church of the Nativity, until and unless it genuinely becomes a bargaining chip in talks with Israel to reach a final status agreement. The Israeli police, however, have carried out an expansion of the buffer zone, and have been stationed there until Israel's High Court of Justice will rule on the legality of the expansion. From Friday's Bethlehem incident until the High Court's ruling, there was a legally recognized buffer zone, but as of Saturday, the zone along the Jordan River could be expanded. In a statement, the Palestinian security forces said the expansion would be conducted in a "non-violatory manner and by mutual agreement." "This step aims to establish the legal framework for the security presence in the city of Bethlehem, in order to protect the life and property of Palestinian citizens," it said. The expansion could serve as one of two assurances to Israel that the Palestinian Authority is being forthright and real about negotiations by avoiding a major incident. The other assurance is that negotiations won't resume while the buffer zone is in place. On Friday, the high court ruled that the police operation had been carried out without legal justification, and that the police couldn't keep the expanded buffer zone for another six months. The court only ruled on Friday, leaving the police room to continue its expansion, presumably to give them a month to
