A downloadable release of the song "Black Dive" performed by

Yulia Sadovyova and Matvei Gornyi, from the soundtrack of the 3D film "Phantom" (2016), released in three variations: Original Soundtrack, Edit-Extended, and Edit-Marked. Spoiler Warning! Up to now, I've been fairly consistent in describing the reactions of each and every song in the soundtrack. But now is a special case - this song is entirely improvisational, and in that respect it's unique. It's a landmark in the history of Russian film soundtracks, because the duo behind this song - Vladimir Kolychev and Andrei Kovalenko - were in fact behind only one other song from the same soundtrack. So for the moment, it's safe to mention that the song you're about to hear was the only other one that the "Phantom 3D" soundtrack contained. Russian pop-rock duo Vladimir Kolychev and Andrei Kovalenko were well-established names since their first success in 1993-94. Long before that, though, they made a name for themselves as part of the jambandproject "Method", which was also known as "Avengers of the Universe". They've released over a dozen records and have toured the world several times, and in 2003-2007 they also released a few solo albums. But it was their lengthy collaboration with Japanese composer Ryuichi Sakamoto, which started in the late 90s, that eventually led to their triumphant return as a duo, back in 2010. They had previously collaborated on stage, but that was really all. The first time they appeared on film soundtrack was 2011, with a cover of Sakamoto's "Orpheus", for the crime thriller "City Besieged". It was a one-off, and they didn't return. - Hi, my name is Vladimir Kolychev. I want you to tell something about yourself. - Well, my name is Andrei Kovalenko, and I am from Moscow. - All right, let's talk about "Black Dive" from your new album. - We actually started working on this song around 1996, at this time, and it's built on a drum track we did the year before with another project. This drum rhythm was originally bass line to dub version of a JP-rock song, like, we used it as a bass part in our song. So the thread was there already, we get closer to the real object, we add more detail. By placing objects in the scene, the detail of your environment is dictated by the amount of detail within the environment. This rule is a bit counter-intuitive. We usually think of more detail as better. But, when placing objects into the scene, the more the detail, the more of the detail is rendered and the less of the image is the object. To minimize this effect, you want to place objects in your scene with medium to low detail. Look for medium to low detail object types and place them near or in the center of your scene.

Examples Lighting the Scene The final consideration on how to lay your scene out is lighting. Lighting is what you want and don't want to see in a scene. Black The space where there is no detail. Or, the object in the image is so dark it would be the equivalent of “black”. In this case, we want a lot of detail to be rendered. White The space that is completely filled with white. We only want this image to be bright. We don’t want to have detail in this area of the image. Correct The space that has been blocked off by shadow. This area of the scene would be excluded from the render. If this was where the object was actually located, we would want to render all of the information within the scene. Wrong The area that has been filled with too much detail. This is the equivalent of using the “Blinds” option in a window. We
