Hard-to-learn, non-linear gameplay with a tight focus on the tactical aspects. Game Play: "Pen & Paper"-like gameplay, with tactical combat situations instead of individual actions. Difficulty: Easy-medium. Escalate for higher difficulty. Controls: Movement: Mouse only. Arrows. Targeting: Arrow keys Item management: Shift+Mouse button. Fire: Space. Pressing the Space-key opens the action panel, in which you're able to drag and drop blocks to open new passages for your player or blocks to consume. Additionally, you can use the R key to switch the action panel to a spot which allows you to quickly toggle the player or block. A demonstration of the game: This is the first time that I've created a game tutorial video, so I'm not too sure if it's the best possible way to convey the core gameplay. If you have suggestions, I would be very happy to hear them. A: I think a tutorial video isn't that bad for learning the basic skills of the game. From your description, I think you are already providing enough information to the player. However, it is still a great step to add video tutorials into your game. I'd say the following tutorials would be a great help: Build and upgrade basic building blocks Introduce the fundamental mechanics of combat Teach about the key game mechanics like, hiding in cover, looking up, shoot first, etc. Once I watched your video, I can see that you already set up a tutorial building and asked the player how they would like to play the game. So it is great how you have finished the tutorial. As it seems, your game is already playable if you finish your tutorial. But there is still some room to improve your tutorial. I think you should watch other game tutorials. You may want to look up tutorials for: building your buildingblocks introducing your buildingblocks to your player (as you did in your tutorial) combat I think that having videos (which are shown after finishing the tutorial) is a great idea to introduce new mechanics and the game itself to your player. Since your game is complex, I think it is already too late for making a tutorial. Instead you should start to watch tutorials for other c9d1549cdd
