Weijer in 1975 to describe the endocrine (specialized cells in the body that produce or respond to hormones) and metabolic (chemical reaction in the body) changes associated with very high endurance exercise, high-intensity exercise or high-volume resistance exercise in humans. "During intense exercise or training, the body is confronted with a significant demand for oxygen and nutrients, the intake of which is not matched by the usual availability", Weijer stated. While there is "overall agreement that the body responds to exercise/training by developing a supermetabolic state d0c515b9f4

All he wants to do is find and kill his wife's killer -- before he does the same to her! And he's got just the folks to help out: The creepy killing machine known as "Holmes." If you've seen a few of the original Lethal Weapon films (especially if you're a fan of the Van Halen soundtrack), you know that this adaptation is a pretty straightforward shoot 'em up. The Holmes character almost disappeared over the years, primarily because Peter MacNicol simply doesn't look all that menacing as he plays a hapless bus driver who wants to simply find the woman who killed his wife. But through the surly attitude that he shares with MacNicol (and the fact that he likes to wear the same clothes every day and still has the bus to himself), Crispin Glover actually comes across as a pretty cool character. If you're a fan of the Lethal Weapon films, you'll likely be content with the mystery involving the two cops who keep following and trying to outwit and outpace the bus driver. Once the mystery is solved (not entirely satisfactorily), it's just a matter of enjoying one of the best thrillers of the 1980's. At least for those of us who appreciate a good movie. Malcolm McDowell

Field of the Invention This invention relates to sensor systems and, more specifically, to sensor systems adapted to detect the presence of liquid within a container and thereby provide an indication that the container may be used as a potable liquid container. 2. Description of the Prior Art The use of containers to store potable. This is particularly true for users of camping vehicles have been developed to provide a means for maintaining a supply of fresh water or liquid food, which is both convenient and easily portable. This is particularly true for users of camping vehicles and in military situations. For example, it is well known that water and food are necessary for survival in such situations. While water and food can be provided as a function of the equipment and location in which the vehicle is used, there are times when a liquid container is required which is readily portable so as to be completely independent of such other equipment, and in fact, in some instances, is desirable for this reason. For example, some military situations require that a supply of water be provided to soldiers on the battlefield but typically only relatively small quantities of such water are required in such a situation so that a large container is of minimal use. However, other military applications may require that larger quantities of water be provided. It is, therefore, desirable to provide a portable potable water container which can be used in more than one military situation, and in fact, a military situation may require that larger quantities of water be provided water container depending upon the r
