Steamboat Springs | A lack of manpower and a strict deadline may be causing the Steamboat Springs Police Department to think smaller, officials said today. Lt. Tim Roach said the department has considered a request that staff members volunteer for other duties to free officers to work on drug cases. One of the officers in the department's Investigative Services Unit has been working out of the narcotics unit for the last year or so, Roach said. However, this officer also works part time as a school crossing guard, he said. Roach said the officer will likely be moved into the investigative services unit and assigned to patrol duty for the next few days. While the officer has worked on investigations before, Roach said, it doesn't always mean they have enough officers to work on every case. Roach said the department is working with the county attorney to try to come up with a plan in which officers can volunteer to work on special-case investigations. "We don't like making announcements, but (we are) going to have to do that," Roach said. Roach said officials are also considering some changes to reduce manpower in the department. Roach said the department will try to reduce overtime and workloads on the SWAT team, which has done two hostage rescue operations since the start of the year, and reduce overtime on patrol. "I know it sounds a little cheap, but we probably will have to cut the overtime on some of our more routine patrols," he said. "We still have to investigate the same crimes, but when someone complains of a speeding violation we're not going to spend as much time on it." Roach said he hasn't heard any feedback from the public or other law enforcement agencies about a reduction in police coverage. He said the department works
