Spaceforce Homeworld is a retro-style shooting game with a twist. Combining arcade-style action, shooter elements, and strategy, Spaceforce Homeworld is a cross between the original Evil Alien Birds, and the endless galactic arcade shooter Space Invaders. Deep within the spaceship floating in front of the player is a level. This level has many stages, each containing several gates to enter that later open into a chamber. The player's goal is to destroy the enemy mothership and end the invasion. For our version of Spaceforce Homeworld we have decided to have it be a multiplayer and co-op game. The levels consist of collecting the spheres to get points, collecting power-ups for your tanks or spaceship to help you, and shooting the aliens. Touch Screen Controls: There will be no joystick or keyboard controls for Spaceforce Homeworld in this version. Instead, a touch screen system will be implemented. The touch screen will also allow the player to choose the weapon they want to use, and allows them to shoot. In Spaceforce Homeworld the player can pick up PowerUps that have certain points and add them to the tank or spaceship. The PowerUps can grant the player extra lives, increased firepower, better statistics, and extra shields. For example: The primary weapon can be upgraded with a PowerUp that grants the player the ability to fire twice with one shot. Additionally, there is a beeping alarm that tells the player to call for reinforcements. When this alarm goes off you can use your super power to call for allies to help you. Unlike the original, there is no shortage of power-ups, making the game much more of a challenge. There will be 10 PowerUps in the game that will help the player against the alien hordes. You must use them in strategic order to be effective in beating the waves of alien invaders. 3 playable Tanks: There will be three tanks that the player can use to navigate through Spaceforce Homeworld. Each tank has a starting weapon and a loadout, allowing the player to play the game differently. The WulfTank is a slow, but very powerful tank. It has a starting weapon of a plasma cannon. The WulfTank's loadout has an anti-missile shield, an anti-vehicle shield, and a rate of fire. The FlyTank is a fast tank with a starting weapon of a plasma cannon. The FlyTank's loadout has an anti-vehicle shield, an anti

in the Desert I was finally able to load in the ship from my games last night. And right before the battle, all of the black liquid drained out of the cargo bay. I had a split second warning before everything drained out of the bay. So I wasn't able to unload and switch out my weapons. Unfortunately, this left me with no choice but to use the Adept's bow as the main weapon. I would otherwise be in deep trouble. As it was, I didn't earn any experience until my second attempt to shoot the ground beast in the head (the insta-kill mini-boss). So you can see how that might be of interest to my viewers. But this also brings up a question. The ship was used in a game recently where a new player was playing. It was just a kiosk mission (from a town). But there was no warning. The player couldn't even switch out his weapons before suddenly dead. So can a stranger's ship be used in an RPG if you only fly it around in kiosks? I was really surprised to see no one else's ship get smashed in my kiosk in a town in the past. And I've only played a few kiosk-only missions. So I'm not looking to see if I can use my ship from game to game, but I would really like to know if its a safe thing to do. You're in a pretty obscure spot in my opinion. Unless your a jotgo sending you out specific missions (which is actually rare) it's probably safe. Most of the time you'll be in a squad of two. That way you have a friend there if a mate dies. If you ever end up going rogue (i know you see it one road) you can always search around good for grog or pool when a group's not around. Of course there's a right way and a wrong way to play, and you're doing one of the wrong ways. As you get better you'll start to see that your ship's just there to glide around in, and you'll be fine. Just out of curiosity- what version of the game is this? It's possible that a newer patch has been released since your last game and that's why the ship no
