A: You need to update IsReversed to true after you flip it. Also, you need to be able to either change the back color independently of the fore color, or have a separate color for the back color. It seems that you need both. Since you flip the direction at the same time, it's not a problem that you flip it back to the first state in the Setter. That's what the IsReversed parameter is for. However, Setter won't update the value of the property when it's directly set (what you do when you write this.Foreground = Background). So, when you change the Foreground, you need to do both: If (_Converter!= null) _Converter.ConvertBack(value, typeof(SolidColorBrush), _ConverterParameter, out color); this.Foreground = value; this.IsReversed = true; If you need to keep track

This study has attempted to provide quantitative definitions of how the diameter of corneal collagen fibrils (which are approximately 8 nm in diameter) influences the thickness of the central part of the cornea. A scanning electron micrograph was used to make measurements of the central collagen fibrils of corneas taken from three healthy human cadavers and the central collagen fibrils of five human donor eyes donated for corneal transplantation. These measurements have then been compared with the central corneal thickness (CCT) determined by ultrasonography. The "mean" diameter of the central collagen fibrils was 4.1 micron (SEM +/- 0.3, n = 67). The CCT varied between 50.3 and 58.9 micron (mean = 55.5 micron). The relationship between collagen fibril diameter and CCT was determined by linear regression to be: CCT = 5.57 - 0.055(diameter of collagen fibril). A regression of CCT on collagen fibril diameter

(diameter of type I collagen fibrils) gave: CCT = 5.08 - 0.026(diameter of type I collagen fibrils).If you're having trouble with the line connecting to the root site when hosting a safe, secure website, here are 5 ways to fix it.
