Field of the Invention The invention relates to an injection nozzle having an externally arranged drive unit. 2. Description of the Related Art Usually, as is known from practice, drive units for injection nozzles are arranged in the area of the nozzle and inject a considerable quantity of heat into the nozzle when actuated. Consequently, a burn of the material in the nozzle casing can occur, resulting in the destruction of the nozzle, if this burn is extensive. For this reason, when it is intended to provide an injection nozzle with a drive unit, expensive measures are necessary to avoid a burn of this type. Injection nozzles are also known in which an external drive unit is adhesively bonded onto the nozzle. This externally arranged drive unit is supplied with electrical energy via a flexible lead line and is supplied with hydraulic medium via a fluid supply line. The disadvantage in this case is the relatively complicated and costly assembly of the injection nozzle. Injection nozzles are also known in which a gearing is provided between the drive device and the nozzle. This gearing takes place via a flexible lever. The disadvantage in this case is that the drive unit causes considerable wear of the nozzle, so that the nozzle must be c6a93da74d
