From the very beginning of Beyond Earth, the developers did not know what kind of game they were going to release, so the game was designed to enjoy the player in all its forms. Providing the chance to the player to explore the entire map of the planet at his leisure, and since the game is a sandbox, in the final version of it will likely not be possible to reach the end of the game without crossing most of the planet, especially seeing that the game is designed for a second round of missions, and even the greatest challenge, which allows the player to access the core of the planet. Playing in Beyond Earth allows the player to explore the world in an almost 3D perspective, not allowing him to see the entire map as a flat area, but being able to jump out and explore the map, entering the game world and going to the far reaches of the map in a few clicks, at any time he wishes. In Beyond Earth, the player is supported in all his actions by a group of developers, which allows you to download new units, technologies and buildings, developing the game environment, in addition to the usual game situations you would have faced in a sandbox, such as the construction of objectives in the form of empires, its own empire and the life of the faction. All of this will be done at the keyboard, having the opportunity to use not only the hotkeys of the most popular programs, but also learn the keyboard to operate the game. In the game, the player can do whatever he wants. With the exception of empires, the only constraint is that the size of the map around the planet and the amount of money and resources available at the start of the game are definite. Thus, the player can select an initial maximum number of units, technologies and buildings in the game, since, unlike other sandbox games, such as the Civilization series, its possible to have unlimited resources of money and time.
