The way this program handles auto-importing of images is prominent. If Lightroom detects a new photo or video in the folder with a progress bar appearing, it will make that photo available in the workflow. The fact that it was extremely hard to lose a single image in such a folder was certainly a plus. Maybe it was Adobe's way of helping those with slow internet connections avoid the "file missing" signs that usually appear. I had nothing but a good experience with Lightroom 5's handling of photos. I am commenting on an updated version, though, and that's where I hit speed bumps. Native RAW support is great. If you like to apply alternate edits to your images in PhotoImpact or Photoshop before switching to Lightroom, those edits are available in Lightroom. The program remembers all the settings on your RAWs! That's a killer feature that one can't help but be happy about. You can adjust the white balance settings, crop the image, straighten and rotate the image. Further, if you have the smart "Auto-Level Curves" setting in Auto De-DARK, the image is automatically and subtly retouched with the default settings. Overall, I think you'll be extremely happy with Photoshop CC if you're willing to put the time into learning it, familiarizing yourself with both the feature set and interface elements. If you aren't, I would wait to see whether the popular cloud-based features — where you can purchase, organize, and even share content — earn Adobe their subscription-based revenue model. The company clearly has the perfect product here, and it would be a shame to miss out on anything that encourages even more creativity and innovation.
