Jetpack.[A study of peri-operative symptoms of cesarean section in patients with pre-eclampsia]. To investigate the peri-operative symptoms of cesarean section in patients with pre-eclampsia. A total of 105 patients with pre-eclampsia scheduled for cesarean section from July 1, 1995 to June 30, 1997 were divided into severe pre-eclampsia group (n = 49) and mild-moderate pre-eclampsia group (n = 56). All patients were subjected to complete medical history and laboratory tests including blood urea nitrogen (BUN), creatinine, urine protein, liver function, and serum platelet count. The gestational age was evaluated on the basis of the standard table of gestational age. The blood loss was recorded from the beginning of the operation to the time of the first post-operative day. On each of the first three post-operative days, patients were required to fill out a questionnaire for evaluating the severity of pain. The pain score was compared between the two groups on each of the first three post-operative days. Of the 105 patients, 23 (21.9%) required general anesthesia (GA group) and 82 (78.1%) received spinal anesthesia (SA group). The major clinical features of severe pre-eclampsia were hematuria, lower limb edema, and proteinuria. The gestational age of the GA group and SA group were significantly lower than those of the whole population. The pre-eclampsia index (PI) of the GA group was significantly higher than that of the SA group (0.86 +/- 0.09 vs 0.72 +/- 0.08). The score of rest pain was significantly higher in the GA group than that in the SA group (7.9 +/- 2.1 vs 2.1 +/- 1.7). The scoring of abdominal pain was significantly higher in the GA group than that in the SA group (6.4 +/- 1.9 vs 2.9 +/- 1.8). The peri-operative blood loss was significantly greater in the GA group than that in the SA group (582.5 +/- 211.6 ml vs 408.6 +/- 153.5 ml). The patients who received GA had a higher blood loss 79a2804d6b
